The easiest thing to do may be to open a search engine and type in a little information about your business (such as "real estate") and "business tips for tough times". It may be all you need to get advice. If you can't find exactly what you're looking for, though, there are sites that are designed to offer tips, as well as answer any questions you may have about running your business.

About.com, a network of sites that offer lots of great information on a variety of topics, has a small business site. It offers articles and blog posts that give business tips for tough times, and has a forum that you can use to ask questions that can be answered by other small business owners who might be in the same situation as you.

The Small Business Administration (SBA) also has a website that can give you good business tips for tough times. The site also includes a Small Business Planner, that can give you all the information you need to help you start and maintain your small business. It even offers a Local Resources section that may have business tips for tough times that are specific to your local community.

Yahoo! offers a directory of helpful links for business owners that cover nearly every topic you can think of, and can lead you to sites that offer specific information and business tips for tough times that are specific to your industry.

There is a business-focused search engine at business.com that not only gives you statistics and profiles, but gives you updated news and financial information that can lead to business tips that can help you stay successful.

These are just a few of the many resources available to small business owners. When going through tough economic times, information is key, and through these resources, as well as others, you can get the answers to your questions, find the support you need, and have a good list of tips for tough times that will help your business stay strong no matter what the economic climate.
